

Starr's Childhood Is Traced By Her Family

By CARL D. GROAT (United Press Staff Correspondent)

(As reported from the talk of Mrs. Helen Faithfull, her daughter, Tucker, and her step-father, Stanley Faithfull.)

New York.—(UP)—The Faithfull family went back today amid the treasures of memory to paint for the reading public a picture of the dead Starr Faithfull as an adorable child, with an early love of the beautiful and artistic, fearless, courageous, self-reliant.

They traced for the United Press a story of her childhood, some incidents of which might be duplicated in any family, but many of which were stamped with an individuality that marked Starr Faithfull.

An Accomplished Swimmer Starr, who came to the end of her career by drowning, learned to swim before she could walk.

She once held a mad dog while a crowd of grown people stared in amazement at her pluck as she bado officers not dare to shoot her pet. The dog died in his hydrophobia as Starr clung to him, unafraid.

She didn't like dolls, but was fond of a sort of doll made of a clothes hanger that bore the descriptive name of "Hanger" and had a place of honor among her childish possessions. The doll was treated one day for "sore throat" by Starr.

Coated With Butter She loved dogs and one dog was named "Bubbles." She amused herself one day by coating him with butter, and though he was forceful as to some, he did not object to this treatment from his mistress.

She had an early love for books, and as her mother put it, she had a lot of "imaginary friends," the fairies, princes and princesses of the story books.

These were some of the things that the woman, worn by the strain of Starr's death, and the incessant questioning of authorities and press, told today in the simple living room of her home in St. Luke's place, with the stepfather and Tucker Faithfull contributing occasionally an anecdote or incident.

A fond scene it was from this woman who has been harassed to the point of nervous exhaustion.

Born In Evanston She traced the life of Starr from her birth, Jan. 26, 1906, at Evanston, Ill., her boyhood in New Rochelle, N. Y., the move to Montclair, N. J., and later in Brookline, Mass., a fashionable suburb of Boston.

The story goes through her school life in Miss Julia Parks' exclusive school at Chestnut Hill, Brookline, and the first year in the Rogers Hall school, a smart finishing school at Lowell. The later life of the girl will be developed in subsequent articles, tracing the changes which made Starr a girl of many moods.

As a baby, Starr was "one of the most energetic of children." She had a tremendous amount of spirit, and was at times a bit difficult to control. A doctor diagnosed her situation as merely a slight excess of spirit. She started creeping early in infancy and liked to crawl up and down the beach at Centerville. Before she could swim, she would creep into the water. Water was her refuge from people whom she didn't fancy.

Sense of Artistic Colors fascinated her. As a baby, she loved flowers at her crib, and as she grew older, the sense of the beautiful and the artistic developed. She did not like to see people cut flowers or wear them on their dresses. She was sensitive and retiring, but the folks of the story books were her good companions and her reading started at an early age.

She adored her younger sister, Tucker, and exercised an air of responsibility over Tucker. Often she felt Tucker's wrists to see if Tucker was "gaining or losing weight."

Starr had a flair for the artistic, and she could draw remarkable sketches. She would amuse little friends with her pictures and with the simple stories she invented to accompany them.

Other youngsters liked her, but she could sometimes plague. Once she put "Fiddler Crabs" in the rompers of a little playmate much to the playmate's discomfort.

Startled Company In New Rochelle, she startled a company at a tennis tournament drinking ginger ale, when she inquired of her mother: "Mother, why don't you dip your bread in your whisky?"

At Miss Parks school where she entered at the age of 6 1/2, she was an apt pupil, and so much a favorite that the school heads told Mrs. Faithfull when she once thought of taking the girl out that they wouldn't think of it even if she were to remain practically a free pupil.

Her art work developed in the school and she showed further talent for miniatures, Christmas cards and animal drawings.

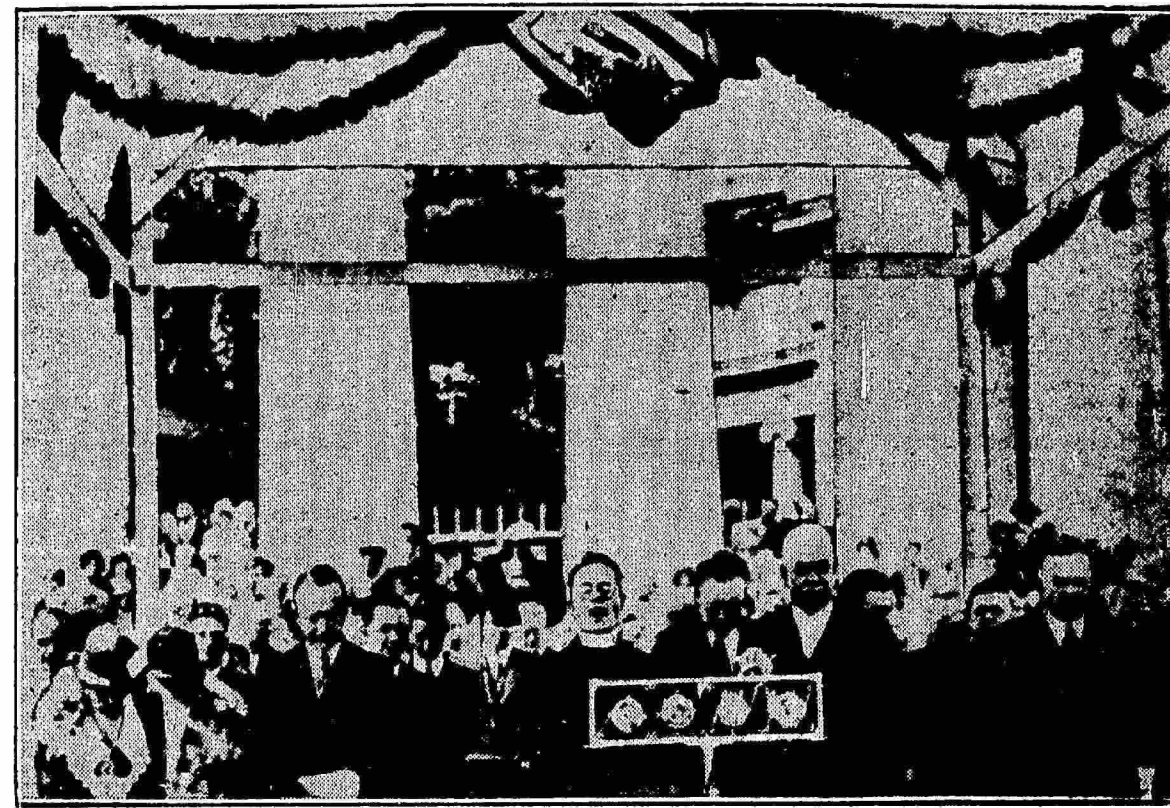

So fond was she of her school work that she hid the fact of an abscess and incipient pneumonia so she would not be credited with an absence from school.

Educational Fund When the time came for her to enter a higher school, Mrs. Faithfull's visitors interested themselves in her further career and arranged a fund for her education. This fund was entrusted to Andrew J. Peters of Boston, who has been a congressman and mayor of Boston.

Her "mem book" at Rogers Hall noted that she was winner of a swimming tournament with 149 points. There were some attractive sketches in this book, a few demerit cards—none of them for smoking, for she didn't indulge, her mother commented; some Christmas cards, pictures of her classmates and one magazine clipping of a handsome man.

There are theater programs, and seat checks, one of them for "Texas Austin's Rodeo," Aug. 18, 1923. And she relates on one page a summer journey, listing a number of hotels where she stayed. More concerning this phase of her career will come later.

Hoover And Coolidge Laud Harding

Picturing Warren G. Harding as a man betrayed by his supposed friends and martyred by his grief, President Calvin Coolidge dedicated the $800,000 memorial to the chief executive at Marion, Ohio. This photo, sent by plane to Cleveland and thence telephoned to NEA Service and The Sheboygan Press, shows the dedication ceremony in the memorial. Left to right: former President Calvin Coolidge; the Rev. Fr. Spickerman; Senator Watson of Indiana; former Senator Joseph S. Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, chairman of the Harding Memorial association, and President Herbert Hoover.
